CHAUNCEY DEPEW, G. O. P. DELEGATE AT 82, TELLS SECRET OF ETERNAL YOUTH

Chauncey M. Depew (right) and his son Chauncey, photographed at Chicago convention.

CHICAGO, June 9.—"Live naturally and keep sweet."

That's the demonstrated formula of Former Senator Chauncey M. Depew of New York for keeping young. Mr. Depew, known in his home town as "The Peach," is in Chicago as a delegate to the G. O. P. convention. Radiating the spirit of vigor and vivacity and fairly bubbling with the merry youth of old age, the famous after-dinner speaker and statesman, fully attired in his "soup and fish" and just about to plunge into a dinner engagement, gave five minutes to a reporter and made every minute count.

"How old are you?" asked the reporter, diffidently.

"Eighty-two years young last April, and getting younger every day," replied Mr. Depew with a laugh.

"How do you manage to keep so young?"

"My recipe is to live naturally and keep sweet. By that I mean to do every day the things that it comes most natural to do. Because of my advancing years I neglect nothing in the daily routine I have followed all my life.

"I keep up my club, business, church and outdoor activities and live close to my friends. I read every newspaper I can lay my hands on and keep in close touch with contemporaneous events. I am careful of my diet, get my rest and a fit for dull care."

"How many speeches do you figure you have made in your career as a banquet orator?"

"Only last week in New York I actually made an estimate of this. You see I've been at it for more than sixty years, and I have made an average of 200 annually. That makes 12,600, and with the one I made last night it boosts the figures to 12,601."

"Are banquet speakers born or made?"

"They're made, my boy; they're made. And how they do change. It used to be all story telling, now the postprandial speech is usually an essay, and essays breed indigestion."

"Do you have a favorite banquet story?"

"No, I'm a poor hand to remember stories. My line of talk suggests them, and then I use them for illustrations."

"Do you find any humor in politics?"

"Absolutely none. That day is past. It's the deep, serious stuff that counts now. Abraham Lincoln, the greatest story teller who ever lived, used to spice his campaign speeches with humorous anecdotes, and they went big. Tom Cowan was another of the same school. 'Billy' Mason of this city is a more recent illustration of the laugh-creating political orator. Now the campaign speakers must get down to brass tacks and pound on cold facts."

"Is American humor holding its own?"

"Yes, but it, too, is changing. We used to laugh at Sam Slick and Artemus Ward and rave over Saxe's poetry. Now they are all forgotten. Today it is George Ade, Ellis Butler, Irvin Cobb and other writers less known who are tickling the funny-bone of the American public with the delectable humor they can understand. Mark Twain is the only one of the old-time humorists who still holds good."
